Social work is a professional service, based on scientific knowledge and skill in human relations, which helps individuals, groups, or communities obtain social or personal satisfaction and independence. While professional social work was first performed by private or public agencies, it is now also carried on in private practice, by various counselling services, and in other settings. The term social welfare has a broader meaning than professional social work. In the definition accepted by the United Nations, it includes organized activities aimed at helping individuals or communities to meet their basic needs, and at promoting their well-being in harmony with the interests of their families and communities. Education, labour legislation, and recreation contribute to the well-being of the population, but we do not include them in our discussion of social welfare.

We shall, however, discuss the structure and function of social services administered by public and private organizations. The objective of these services is to secure for each human being, as much as possible, the economic and social necessities: a decent standard of health and living conditions, equal opportunities, and the highest possible degree of self-respect, dignity, and freedom of thought and action without interfering with the same rights of others.

Social security is a program of protection provided by social legislation against sickness, unemployment, death of wage-earner, old-age or disability dependency, and accidents – contingencies against which the individual cannot be expected to protect himself. As a rule, protection is secured by various forms of social insurance, public assistance, and health and welfare services. In the strict sense the term social security does not include private, voluntary social services or industrial or cooperative activities, but in many countries these play an important role.

The philosophy underlying our system of social welfare is an essential cultural characteristic of modern society.
